BEDLINER FOR THE BODY

BY Jerrod Jones

PHOTOGRAPHY
JERROD JONES

Our buddy's truck was getting pretty gnarly lookin'. Part of the front clip was blue, but not the same color blue that was under the faded red the rest of the body was painted at some point in time. The steel under the paint had seen better days as well, the rain gutters were sort of a papier-mâché of rust chips rather than stiff steel, and there were one or two tiny moon-viewing holes in the top of the cab. It wouldn't make sense to put much money into a body like this, but the rest of the truck is in pretty decent shape so it still has a few more wheeling years in it. But how do you give an old trail truck a fresh new look? Durabak has a smooth do-it-yourself paint-on bedliner that can be used to coat the entire body of a truck. This was perfect for our buddy's '72 Chevy: the Durabak coating would give us one uniform color (many of which we had to choose from), reduce in-cab noise, give good protection from rough off-road encounters, diminish continuing rust from getting much worse, and fill the tiny rust holes left in the body.
